

The Native American Journalists Association in partnership with Columbia University and the Society of Environmental Journalists present an exciting and creative way to learn about environmental issues confronting Native American communities in Lincoln, Neb., and the surrounding area. The Ecology tour introduces working journalists to pressing environmental issues of the Great Plains region, with emphasis placed on fostering communication and cultural understanding about issues affecting both Indian and non-Indian rural communities. Tour participants will hear from tribal elders and local officials about the implications of pressing environmental issues. This is one of NAJA's most popular and exciting convention programs.
